Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Journal of Hygiene, 1914, Vol. 14 Of the total were 20 years of age or under. It is possible that one or two typhus cases may be included, but it is certain also that some of the more prolonged remittent fevers in children which we considered in the earlier years to be malarial were mild enteric. Cases are by no means rare with an intermittent temperature throughout. Now that we are having systematic examinations of the blood and excreta at the International Health Bureau we find such atypical cases occur. It seems probable that the comparative rarity of enteric fever among the middle-aged native-born population is largely due to its not uncommon occurrence in childhood. It should be pointed out that the statistics of in-patients are no real criterion of the actual prevalence of enteric fever because there is, as a rule, such a strong prejudice on the part of many members of the native population Jewish and Moslem - against sending their friends to a hospital when acutely and dangerously ill that a large proportion of these cases are treated at home where under the conditions of medical practice here which often means a new doctor every two or three days - they never get properly diagnosed. Here again Widal s test or bacteriological examination of the excreta is proving of great assistance for Speedy and accurate diagnosis. During the present year we have had three cases of enteric in the hospital, in all the diagnoses were confirmed by the Widal test. Among the British residents in Palestine, enteric fever is certainly not as frequent as in Beirut and Cairo - with their public water supply and town sewers -...
