Excerpt from The Book of Merlin, the Book of Sir Balin: From Malory s King Arthur, With Gaston s Preface, Edited, With an Introductory, Sketch and Glossary Courtesie, Reynard the Fox, the Eneydos, and the Golden Legend. Facsimiles of the first and last are accessible in many libraries, and will well re pay the student s examination. But two great classics of English literature deserve special mention bistori cally. One is the poems of Chaucer, for Caxton s issue of them in print must have done much to perpetuate and spread the fame and in?uence of the Father of English Poetry. The other is Malory s Le Morte Darthnr, which, had Caxton not printed it, might not perhaps have entranced readers through long gen erations down to our own day, or served as a source wherefrom poets and painters of the nineteenth cen tury might learn of Arthur, the quest of the Grail, and Tristan and Iseult. Indeed, but for Caxton, these stories might not have become in a real sense our per manent possession, for the few English versions, and the French, German, and Dutch versions, have for the most part become accessible only at a compara tively recent date, and, furthermore, in such form that others than students might never have been brought to a knowledge of them.
