On the morrow, New-year s Day, Miss St. Clair was persuaded to dine with the Stanhopes once more. As it was the commemoration of the Circumcision of Our Lord, there was Morning Service in the English Church; and there Miss Agatha was found in her accustomed seat, and with her usual surprises. At the conclusion of the Service, her Matins, she returned home with her young friends. The poor girl seemed very depressed, and did her utmost to give an artificial brightness to her countenance, and a cheeriness to her conversation: at last she admitted that the communication she received yesterday from the Mother Superior, and which Lilian had brought with her into Paris, had much saddened and disturbed her. Mr. Stanhope, said Agatha, on seeing him enter the room, I have been very much pained, and cannot...
